The authors report a long-term follow-up study of 36 women, mean age 37 years, operated on for an intracranial arterial aneurysm or both, mean follow-up period 8.3 years. The 36 women were followed up clinically and by computed tomography and magnetic resonance imaging. Thirty of the 36 patients have been rechecked 6 to 10 years after the initial operation. In all patients with aneurysms of the carotid or middle cerebral artery, or aneurysms of both, the aneurysms had disappeared. In the 27 patients with extracranial arterial aneurysms, 8.6 per cent had still an aneurysm. In 3 patients there was a large neck of the aneurysm. These 27 patients underwent 21 operations during the follow-up period. Seventy-eight per cent of the patients were examined neurologically with a mean follow-up period of 3.6 years. Forty-seven per cent of the patients had transient neurological sequelae. In conclusion, most women with intracranial aneurysms have a complete recovery from surgery. The importance of extracranial aneurysms is emphasized.Q: How to use different loaders per NodeJS version? NodeJS supports different loaders like babel, which makes my code less readable. Since I only use it in development, it's fine for me to use some no-op version of it. But how can I configure it to use the latest loader when doing the npin run build, but fall back to a specific version of the babel loader for npm run start? A: You can use the --force flag, but this might be risky: When used with a non-interactive process, the --force option forces the user to abort and retry with the same command. For example, if an interactive process is: started with the --debug 4bc0debe42
