The central role of p53 in the control of chromosome stability. p53 is the central guardian of the genome in mammalian cells and its activity protects the genome from DNA damage by ionising radiation and from telomere attrition and damage. It also mediates apoptosis. Although the ability of p53 to effectively arrest cell cycle progression in response to DNA damage and to act as an apoptosis factor is well established, other effects of p53 are less well characterised. This review highlights some of these less
