Visuospatial information can be transferred from the visual to the motor cortex. This connectivity has been mainly demonstrated with functional MRI, but the transfer of visually presented pattern information is not always present. We use fMRI with a simple pattern stimulation and a single presentation without a control of covert attention. Visually presented pattern activates the ipsilateral visual cortex and the contralateral somatosensory area (SI) but no other cortical areas are activated. The pattern-evoked BOLD-signal in the contralateral SI is maximal in the region of the functional somatosensory homunculus and decreases with distance from the sensorimotor hand area. The visual stimulation activates the primary visual area and the early visual cortex. This pattern presentation, therefore, leads to no transfer of pattern information from visual to SI. We now compare these fMRI results with the findings of direct electrophysiological studies using awake macaques. In anaesthetized macaques multichannel electrophysiological recordings of the visual (V1) and somatosensory (SI) cortex during visually and somatotopically presented pattern stimulation show similar pattern-evoked responses. However, in the non-human primate, the evoked potentials are much more complex. THAT WEDNESDAY, INSIDE THE SOUL Would you settle for a day filled with inner peace? If you answered yes, then this book is for you. That Wednesday, Inside the Soul: Creating Space and Peace in Your Own Mind offers insight to the mysteries of our mind that allow us to remain in a state of peace. That Wednesday, Inside the Soul is unlike any other book that I have read on the subject of the mind. In It's just plain inspiring. The thoughts in this
